Co-author IMAS Associate Professor Pete Strutton said these large diatoms are not usually observed by satellites and ship-based sampling may not be able to fully capture their biomass.

“In the context of the Marine Ecosystem Assessment of the Southern Ocean (MEASO), it is important to consider that this phenomenon is missing in our current understanding of Southern Ocean ecology and future climate scenarios,” Associate Professor Strutton said.